

THE BEST RESTAURANTS IN SAN FRANCISCO RIGHT NOW

DAISY BARRINGER

If you're giving yourself a few goals to accomplish in 2018, allow us to humbly suggest adding "eating at all of these restaurants" to that checklist. At the top of this lovely rundown (not ranking!), you'll find the best new restaurants in San Francisco -- the places that opened in January that we can't get enough of and are sure to only get better as the months go on. Keep scrolling and you'll hit our best of the best, a section devoted to the most mouthwatering places to eat in San Francisco (new or old) at any given time -- the spots you'd recommend off the top of your head when someone inevitably asks you "so where should we eat tonight?"

TREASURE ISLAND

An island oasis with comforting food and stunning views

Treasure Island is experiencing a renaissance and this new comfort-casual restaurant built entirely of recycled shipping containers with panoramic views of the SF skyline, Bay Bridge, and Golden Gate Bridge is basically the Sistine Chapel of the isle. This "island oasis" is open for breakfast, lunch, and dinner six days a week with a menu that will satisfy all of your comfort food cravings. Think brioche French toast, a fried egg sandwich, lamb riblets with sweet chili glaze, a short rib "shepherd's pie," Dungeness crab melt, and a double-stacked cheeseburger on a sesame brioche roll.

And, of course, there's a full bar featuring tons of local purveyors. What better way to soak in the views after a satisfying meal and a game of bocce (there's a bocce court and a putting green) than with a drink in hand?
